AB 1493: A Roundtable Discussion of California's Groundbreaking Legislation to Reduce Greenhouse Gas Emissions from Cars and Trucks

With the passage of AB 1493, California once again is leading the country on air pollution issues, this time focused on greenhouse gas emissions from automobiles. The bill requires new regulations in three years to control these emissions. But questions abound:

- Will the new law stand up in court, or are we in for years of legal battles?
- The new law doesn't specify standards: how should regulators write their new rules? What are the best approaches?
- Automakers say that reducing these emissions will spell the end of popular vehicles and cripple the economy: are they right?
- Will California's efforts put a dent in global warming?
- Will other states and the rest of the world follow California's lead? If so, at what cost economically and what gain environmentally?

Join a distinguished panel of legal, economic, and scientific experts to consider these and other critical questions. Get the best and most accurate information about the most important piece of California environmental legislation in years.
